A simple keylogger with clipboard monitoring. PROS: The program runs in the background, providing data on keystrokes. The log files can be copied into the Windows clipboard. CONS: The clipboard monitoring feature works poorly. It's a short-time program, requires a restart to work properly. Keyboard Decoder is a simple application that provides you with a handy screen of ASCII-art characters that are located on the keyboard. As you type into the text field, you'll see a series of related alphabets, or even a word or a sentence to help you locate the corresponding keys. As you may already be aware, most keyboards are equipped with a series of keys that are labeled using the alphabet A through Z and 0 through 9, a simplified, albeit imperfect way of naming keys. The Keyboard Decoder program converts that language of labels into a more legible, user-friendly alternative, as is shown in the image below. As it runs, it displays a series of boxes containing a couple of characters that represent each row of keys on your keyboard. Simply type the character you are searching for to the left of the box, or press one of the arrows on the keyboard. How to Use:

The Keyboard Decoder program is designed to be used in a couple of different ways. You can simply type the characters into the screen or click on the arrow to display the next row. As for the keyboard itself, you can draw a line through any character in the current row or choose the arrow to scroll to the next row. The program is quite simple and easy to use.

There are no settings or configurations to worry about. Evaluation and Conclusion: We like the idea of the Keyboard Decoder program. It does the job of a similar program we reviewed a while back, however, we also believe its execution could be a bit better. Spyware Doctor is a software developed by GoPrivate.
